The fire breaking out in the dead of night, followed by a series of ex-plosions from the cargo that wreeked the steamer; the hurried call for help and the failure of the wireless before its mission could be completed and the name of the steamer or her location given; the long hours spent in the lifeboats with all the consequent suf-fering and the uncertainty as to the fate of the major part of the crew-

The intimate details of the hurried flight for safety, the violent effects of the explosion and the personal in-

of the explosion and the personal incidents that must have arisen can only be guessed at now.

From the description sent out by the Zeilitz yesterday, the Columbian must have been pretty completely wrecked by the explosions. Her foremast was gone and her funnel also had been uprooted. It was undoubtedly the loss of the foremast that disabled the wireless apparatus, and this must have followed very shortly on the outbreak of the fire, for the wireless operator had barely time to send out his call for help before his message was cut off.
